Climate change is forcing change in agriculture, and to adapt, many people are making drastic shifts. Like many farmers, Matthew Hunt has been transitioning to organic and climate-change-friendly production practices.

Hunt began thinking about these issues 15 years ago, when he was still a college student. He remembers hearing about the "convenient" benefits of organics, but lacking details about how to do it. Matthew Hunt tests a soybean growing in a soil tunnel. He says that is a major change compared to traditional agriculture. (Adrian Wyld/Canadian Press) The university student decided to start a farm of his own in British Columbia. "I became extremely inspired by the idea of creating my own food system. Of not having to rely on someone else's supply chain, of farming as an act of beauty." The student started with 10 acres in 2005, and now has 140. His family has gone from five people, to 17, and counting. But Hunt now sees potential pitfalls. He says the increased cost of organic production is a major roadblock, which is why he decided to try new technology, like using heated tunnels to grow crops. It's called "cold climate agriculture," and Hunt is now one of its leading advocates. "When it comes to agriculture, traditional is that we keep the exact same techniques that have been tested for thousands of years," he says. But those traditional techniques are under threat.

Climate change could alter the weather patterns, like snowfall, that many food crops need. Also, warmer weather can increase the amount of moisture needed for crops to grow. "Increased demand for food is something we all must consider. We've got to try and adapt to what the climate may be in the next 50 years," says Hunt. In the past, varieties that can grow in a wide array of environments have always been preferred. But the future may demand a more narrow spectrum. "All these
